Social Bits

Social Bits is a research group based in Linz, Austria.

We focus on the artistic output of social interactions in real world locations.

We are particularly interested in urban environments, public spaces and unique architectural complexes.

Social Bits is interested not solely in social data.

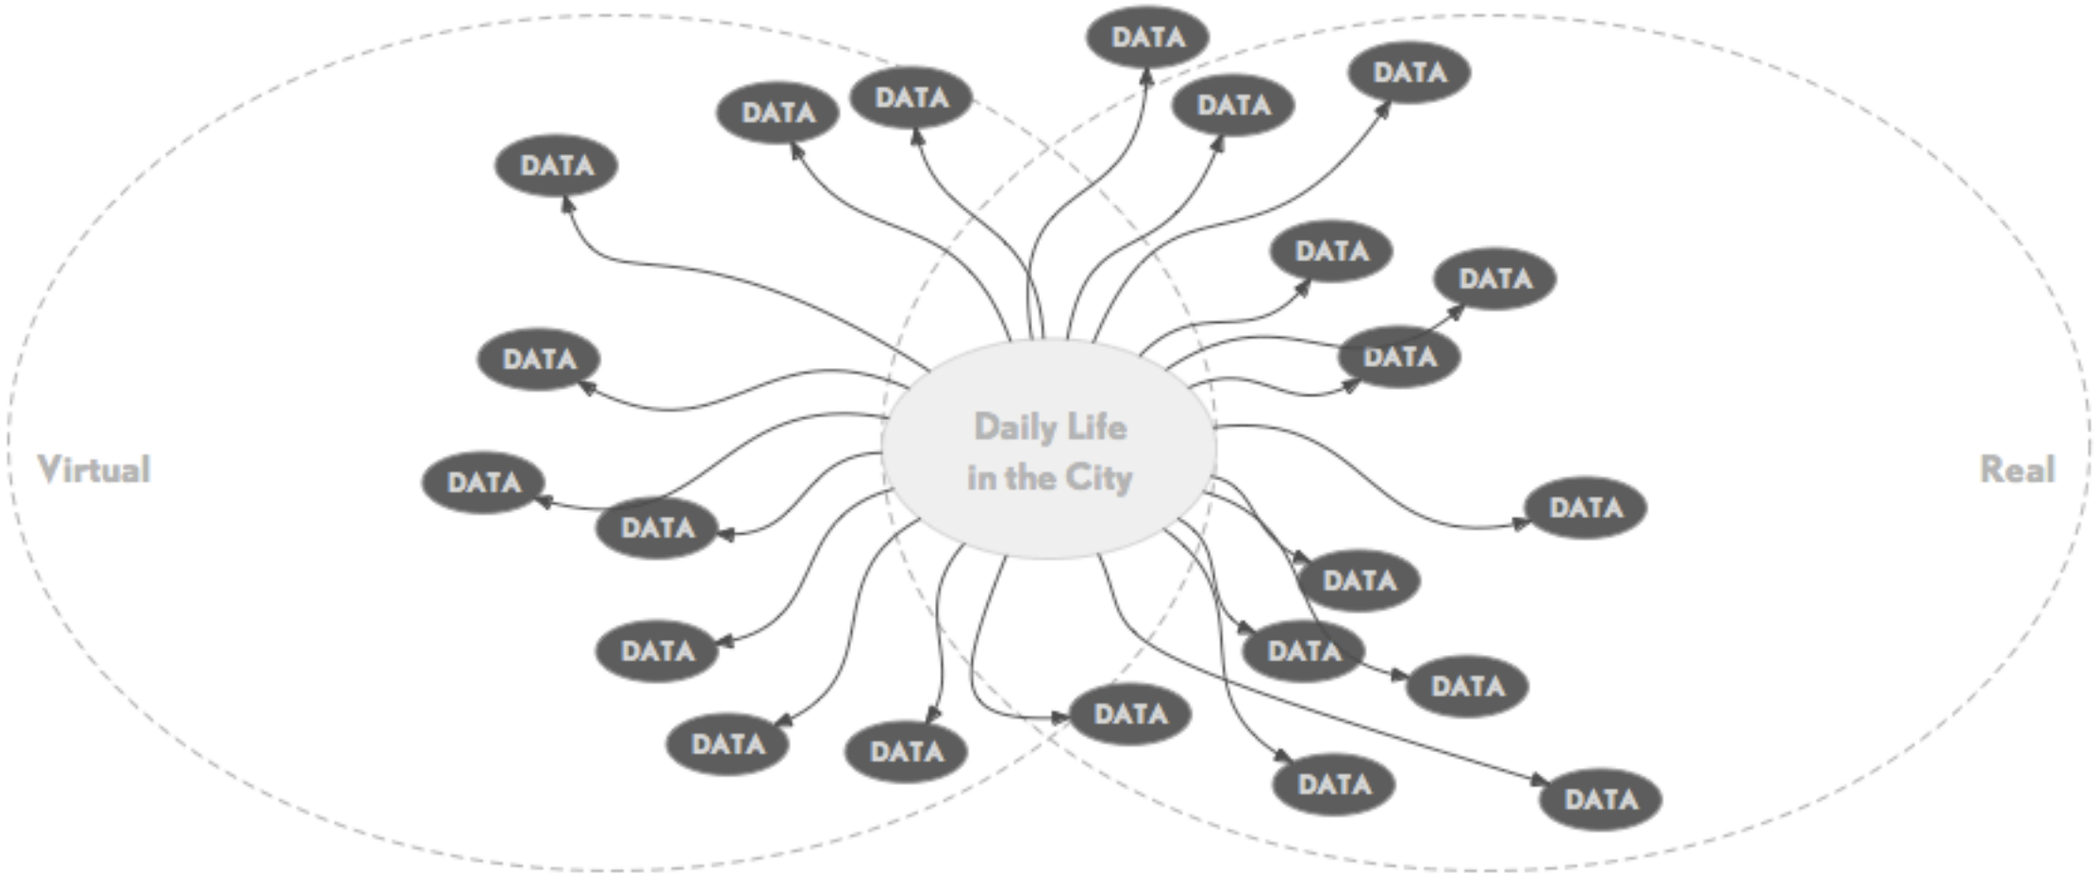

Rather, it is the means of producing the data, and how it can be reflected back on society that interests us.

The process of turning a human thought into digital information, then in turn putting the information in a physical context is what is intriguing.

Materializing Social Data in the City

@ Amber Festival 09

Day by day, life in cities is changing and being affected by the information coming from virtual platforms. The information we create in virtual worlds merges into real life and becomes a part of the daily life activities in cities.

The source of our information, the technology to share information, and the potential media to display the information converge into a new field that can be referred as Urban Information Interfaces.

In "Digital Ground", Malcolm McCullough discusses the "paradigm shift from building virtual worlds toward embedding information technology into the ambient social complexities of the physical world."

is it possible to talk about a feedback loop that may occur between virtual platforms and psychical urban life in the future?

What would happen if we let virtual information shape our environment and architecture?

How would this feedback affect the speed and qualities of communication and the dynamics of our society?
